ANN COULTER & JOHNNY WINTER

Ann: I've held off on writing about soccer for a decade — or about the length of the average soccer game — so as not to offend anyone. But enough is enough. Any growing interest in soccer can only be a sign of the nation's moral decay.

The Dawgmeister: Damn straight. Our national pastime, baseball, is over in the blink of an eye and represents American morality at its best.

Ann: Individual achievement is not a big factor in soccer. In a real sport, players fumble passes, throw bricks and drop fly balls — all in front of a crowd. When baseball players strike out, they're standing alone at the plate. But there's also individual glory in home runs, touchdowns and slam-dunks.

The Dawgmeister: Tell it like it is Annie, soccer players are just one big communist collective with no individual accountability.

Ann: In soccer, the blame is dispersed and almost no one scores anyway. There are no heroes, no losers, no accountability, and no child's fragile self-esteem is bruised. There's a reason perpetually alarmed women are called "soccer moms," not "football moms."

The Dawgmeister: Right you are Ann. No wonder foreigners love socialism.

Ann: Do they even have MVPs in soccer? Everyone just runs up and down the field and, every once in a while, a ball accidentally goes in. That's when we're supposed to go wild. I'm already asleep.

The Dawgmeister: You got that right. It's random. Just thinking about it pisses me off.

Ann: Liberal moms like soccer because it's a sport in which athletic talent finds so little expression that girls can play with boys. No serious sport is co-ed, even at the kindergarten level.

Anne Coulter says: "Grow a pair, soccer moms."

Ann: The prospect of either personal humiliation or major injury is required to count as a sport. Most sports are sublimated warfare. As Lady Thatcher reportedly said after Germany had beaten England in some major soccer game: Don't worry. After all, twice in this century we beat them at their national game.

The Dawgmeister: It's about time someone told the truth about these soccer pussies.

Ann: Baseball and basketball present a constant threat of personal disgrace. In hockey, there are three or four fights a game — and it's not a stroll on beach to be on ice with a puck flying around at 100 miles per hour. After a football game, ambulances carry off the wounded. After a soccer game, every player gets a ribbon and a juice box.

The Dawgmeister: Fuken A Annie, it's one big communist love fest after another.

Ann: You can't use your hands in soccer. (Thus eliminating the danger of having to catch a fly ball.) What sets man apart from the lesser beasts, besides a soul, is that we have opposable thumbs. Our hands can hold things. Here's a great idea: Let's create a game where you're not allowed to use them!

The Dawgmeister: Even scientists agree: All creatures with opposable thumbs are men with souls.

Ann: I resent the force-fed aspect of soccer. The same people trying to push soccer on Americans are the ones demanding that we love HBO's "Girls," light-rail, Beyonce and Hillary Clinton. The number of New York Times articles claiming soccer is "catching on" is exceeded only by the ones pretending women's basketball is fascinating.

The Dawgmeister: And it's about time someone told the truth about women being pussies.

Ann: It's foreign. In fact, that's the precise reason the Times is constantly hectoring Americans to love soccer. One group of sports fans with whom soccer is not "catching on" at all, is African-Americans. They remain distinctly unimpressed by the fact that the French like it.

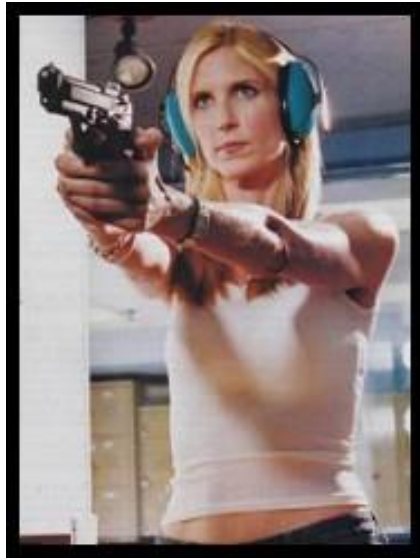

The Dawgmeister: And thanks for continuing to speak on behalf of the rights of African Americans.

Ann: Remember when the media tried to foist British soccer star David Beckham and his permanently camera-ready wife on us a few years ago? Their arrival in America was heralded with 24-7 news coverage. That lasted about two days. Ratings tanked. No one cared.

The Dawgmeister: No sblt Sherlock, that one was quite a dud. And why can't Posh Spice be camera-shy like you?

Ann: If more "Americans" are watching soccer today, it's only because of the demographic switch effected by Teddy Kennedy's 1965 immigration law. I promise you: No American whose great-grandfather was born here is watching soccer. One can only hope that, in addition to learning English, these new Americans will drop their soccer fetish with time.

The Dawgmeister: Hell yeah. Once again, Teddy Kennedy tries to bring in more of these goddamn tired, poor, huddled masses, that friggin' wretched refuse of homeless, tempest-tossed losers so they can vote Democratic and do nothing for the economy.

Annie's got her gun trained on foreigners, soccer players, and other pussies.
